

A Personal Philosophy of Education

Philosophy of nursing/statement of beliefs about nursing

Chia-Hui Chen

I believe that a good nurse is decided by a good heart. It means that a good nurse is willing to help people, especially for people in need. That is why "for the past several years, the American public has perceived nurses as being one of the most honest and ethical professions in the country, and because of this perception, the public trusts nurses" (Schroeter, 2007, p.6). Although doctors have to possess more medical knowledge and skills than nurses, they have a hard time to earn trust because nurses do not only treat patients physically, but also psychosocially by using model & role-model theory. In the first year of nursing school, I learned nursing knowledge and skills to take care of patients; however in this year, I have a seminar which brings all kinds of issues nurses face in the real world to discuss in the class, such as polypharmacy, ethical, advocacy and etc.

For my own nurse-lifespan, being a professional health care provider, I will challenge myself to continually update nursing knowledge and improve nursing skills to provide excellence in care delivery to patients, families and the community. Nursing is not a "stable" job, but a growing job, which means a nurse can not stop learning after graduating from nursing school.

However, as a new graduate nursing student, I still have to learn a lot before achieving the goal, excellence in care delivery. Although I graduate with the latest academic nursing knowledge, experience is a key component in my preparation to be the most effective nurse
